

SPRING 2018: CCSSE and the Citizenship ISLO

Background: Measuring student engagement on a variety of dimensions, the Community College Survey of Student Engagement (CCSSE) asks questions about student behaviors as well as institutional perceptions. It is useful for benchmarking and as a diagnostic tool, and although not intended, it can be used as a proxy for achievement of institutional SLOs. The primary drawback is that student responses are self-reported, as opposed to a direct evaluation of student work and behaviors.

The CCSSE was administered at Skyline College in spring 2016. One thousand and five Skyline College students took the survey, which also was administered in 2012 and 2008. In the past, the data was converted to 0- 100 scales, but now and in the future, the mean of each of the items will be analyzed since each item is more actionable than a holistic analysis. Items without scores from the past are new custom questions that were created to supplement the survey as an indirect measure of the ISLOs. They are designated with a C that precedes their item number.

The ISLO: Students will be able to use knowledge acquired from their experiences at this college to be ethically responsible, culturally proficient citizens, informed and involved in civic affairs locally, nationally, and globally.

Citizenship includes the ability to:

- demonstrate an understanding of their individual role in an interconnected world about a range of global issues.
- demonstrate an understanding of how global, national and local organizations, ideas, and issues are interconnected (e.g., social, cultural, economic, political, and environmental).
- demonstrate scientific literacy concerning a range of global issues.
- demonstrate awareness and sensitivity about how their perspectives are shaped by their experiences and cultural values.
- articulate similarities and contrasts among cultures, demonstrating knowledge of and sensitivity to various cultural values and issues.
- recognize and apply ethical perspectives.
- facilitate a positive, supportive group environment through demonstrated collegiality and leadership.
- demonstrate commitment to active citizenship.
